

Digital Etiquette and Platform Awareness: A Reflection

Self-introduction bridges individual identity and professional perception, but its dynamics shift significantly between physical and digital spaces.

While introducing oneself in real-time, the importance is on the feedback and the real-time reaction of the other party. While, a digital introduction is a static image or video that all people see immediately.

Adopting one's introduction depending on the audience and the platform is essential to uphold proper digital etiquette. In any professional physical environment or on LinkedIn, the emphasis is on the technical sides and the leadership qualities of the person. In other online platforms, the introduction should be modified to adapt to the audience's expectations.

On the Twitter (X) social media platform, the introduction should be short and straight to the point, including technical headlines and the main fields of expertise. On Facebook, the introduction may be slightly more detailed and cover more comprehensive topics related to the profession while still focusing on the community. In contrast, on Instagram, the emphasis is on the aesthetics of the introduction. As the main media type on the platform is imagery, the introduction should communicate one's profession with a BTS feel. The key to remember when introducing oneself online is to keep the primary competence and modify the introduction according to the audience's expectations and etiquette of the platform.
