

My analysis of the role of communication in this scenario is that communication is critical to help the team get to know the audience, share ideas, and find solutions together. When launching an “anti single-use plastic” campaign, one should develop a simple message that would be easy to perceive and communicate via social media, posters, graphics, videos, and other means. Most importantly, one should listen to the audience’s feedback on the campaign to know their needs and desires.

For this reason, my personal communication plan will be aimed at consulting the target audience on the most appropriate ways of communicating the intended message. My intended strategy will be based on creating a friendly and relatable campaign that will encourage individuals, especially the youth, to curb the use of single-use plastics. I will leverage social media to post short messages, graphics, and videos to influence their behavior towards using polythene bags. I will also invite soft comments, questions, and feedback from the audience through the comments section and use them to improve future campaigns.

As for my design for a persuasive message would be based on making an emphasis on the fact that even small efforts can make a difference. I would use social media to post photos and short videos with some common examples of plastic waste reduction, such as using a reusable bottle, a reusable bag, and not using single-use plastics. I would write “One small step makes a difference. Bring your reusable bottle or bag and refuse to buy unnecessary single-use plastic products.” Then, a question could be added “What reusable item do you bring every day?” and an invitation to participate in the campaign.

If one of my subordinates expressed concern that the campaign is not engaging enough, the first thing I would do is not argue with him/her. Instead, I would ask him/her to explain why he/she thinks so, and I would analyze the campaign’s current performance jointly with him/her. We could discuss the engagement metrics, such as the number of views, reactions, comments, shares, to identify the strong and weak elements. Then, I would brainstorm with my subordinate on ways to improve the campaign, including making it more short, visually appealing, using videos, asking questions and using polls, providing more relatable examples. If he/she has a different perspective, we would discuss it together and weigh the alternatives considering the goals, audiences, and their pain points. In any case, we would avoid arguing or criticizing each other and try to see the issue from the opposite side.

By taking a step back and objectively analyzing the facts, we would identify the reasons for the clients’ complaints and jointly develop the best course of action. By doing so, we would mitigate the conflict, build team spirit, and optimize the campaign in terms of engagement and performance.